THE COW OF CHINA

AS times passes, a great deal more will be known about the cow of China, which is in itself a miracle harvest. At the present time this "cow" is responsible for an incredible number of products—auto and airplane bodies, printer's ink and celluloid, salad and lubricating oils, meat and coffee substitutes, glue, cheese, candy, linoleum, paint and rayon, flour and plastics, explosives, to name a few.

We are speaking of the soybean, which is not a miraculous bovine but a botanical marvel that today ranks in importance with the sulfa drugs, vitamins and mechanized warfare. It has practitioners starry-eyed about its high protein, calcium and iron content. And science is extremely interested in its vast industrial potentialities.

War has put the soybean almost at the top of the list of modern discoveries, but it is well to remember that our "discovery" was known to the Chinese thousands of years before the birth of Christ. The Emperor Shen Nung speaks of it in his "Material Medica," written in 2838 B. C. But many ages before this a legend was current which had been handed down in northern China and Manchuria to the present day, telling how man first became acquainted with the little bean.

A caravan of merchants, says the legend, was homeward bound with much gold when it was attacked by bandits. Taking shelter in a ravine, the traders held off the bandits for several days until their food ran out. Starvation threatened. Then a servant came to camp with a sack of beans he had gathered on a vine-like plant. They mashed the beans, made a paste of water and baked it—and on this crude biscuit the famished men regained strength to hold off the outlaws until help could arrive.

Since that time the Chinese have looked upon the soybean as their staff of life. Many of them have never tasted any milk but that of the soybean, which costs a quarter as much as cow's milk but contains food values that are astonishing. Hence, it is called the "Cow of China". For thousands of years it has been the basic protein food in China, Korea, Japan and the Malay Peninsula.

In 1804, a Yankee clipper ship brought the first soybeans to America. But until the Department of Agriculture began a systematic study of the plant shortly before 1900, it was regarded merely as an ornament. William J. Morse, now senior agronomist of the department, has worked for more than 30 years with the quiet fervor of a missionary to bring the magic bean prominently into the agriculture of this country.

That his efforts have borne fruit, consider these figures: In 1922 we grew 9 million bushels of soybeans. In 1939 we grew 90 million bushels! It is now our fourth ranking crop (grain) with an annual value of over 100 million dollars.

There is a reason for this. The little bean really is remarkable. It actually does all the things you hear about. Unlike most plants, there is almost no waste in the soybean. The plant itself makes excellent fodder for animals and is a wonderful soil enricher as it attracts and deposits nitrogen.

The secret of the soybean's versatility lies in its chemical composition: 40 per cent of it is protein, highly digestible, and another 20 per cent is fat, which can be squeezed out or chemically extracted as oil—now an economic rival of cottonseed and peanut oils.

More than three-fourths of the oil squeezed from our soybean crop goes into food products, with the bulk of the rest going into paint, lacquers and shaps. What is left after the oil has been extracted makes soybean meal, which livestock thrives on. About five per cent of it is used to make plastics, fertilizer, macaroni, breakfast foods, baby foods, reducing diets and diabetic foods—for which the bean is admirably suited, having a very low starch content.

Soybeans have an overwhelming advantage as a protein food. Usual sources of protein are, as you perhaps know, milk, eggs, meat and fish—all of which need refrigeration. But soybean meal contains a great amount of protein, and it can be shipped dry, with no cooling. This fact plus the high nutritive value are two reasons why the Army is using it in its new super-pemmican, Pararation.

Soon after Hitler and Stalin drew swords (and Russia cut off the soybeans it was sending into Germany), Herr Hitler put his chemists to work on the task of making super-explosives out of soya oil. They were successful. But chemists in the United States have gone much farther. They have discovered that this unpretentious little bean produces glycerine, waterproofing for fabrics, leather dressings, enamels, paper coating, rubber substitutes and lecithin, which is a coating for chocolate confections, keeping them fresh and adding a rich nut-like flavour. It is also used considerably as an anti-sludge stabilizer in gasoline.

Henry Ford has found many uses for the soybean. Among them, water paints which stand up under a lot of abuse from the weather and which photographs poorly from the air. They are thus excellent for camouflage purposes, an important phase in defending our vital industries from possible bombing attacks—and have the further advantage of being easily washed off after the need for camouflage has passed. Soybean meal, made into a protein solution, can be coagulated into thread for fibre; this fibre has possibilities of replacing wool in its general characteristics, has a natural crimp, and is about 80 per cent as strong, with good possibilities that the strength will be increased.

Ford fibre is being tested by commercial mills to augment the supply of wool; apparently it will eventually make satisfactory felt blankets, sweaters, hats, and suits. Mr. Ford himself has a suit made of 25 per cent soybean fibres. His Highland Park mills, set up originally as a pilot plant, produced 1,000 pounds of fibre a day at half the cost of sheep's wool before they were moved to Dearborn to go into increased production.

Robert Boyer, Ford's brilliant young soya research chief, points out that two acres of land used as grazing pasture for sheep will produce eight to ten tons of sheep wool a year. Whereas, two acres planted in soybean will produce 400 pounds of protein suitable for fibre.

Boyer's most interesting contribution, however, has been soybean cloth and even plastic instrument panels and knobs cast in bright colors. He has devised tough, lightweight fibre-and-plastic sheets suitable for moulding into automobile, jeep and airplane bodies. These sheets have only half the tensile strength of steel but when made double-thick, their collision-proof qualities became ten times those of steel. No jagged edges, no permanent dents. The postwar automobile will be, as Ford sees it, made of these plastic forms bolted in place to a tubular framework which will replace the conventional chassis. The body will weigh only half as much and the car as a whole will weigh only 85 per cent as much as 1942 automobiles.

One aircraft company is making military planes with moulded bodies in which soybean resin is used as the waterproof binder. Controls and ignition parts on many planes are cast in soya products, as are similar parts and steering wheels on autos.

The current war has truly been an incubator for the soybean, giving it new life in a hundred new uses which would have been beyond the conception of those besieged merchants who first ate the bean in desperation so many centuries ago.

But then the current struggle has been the incubator of a vast number of valuable devices not only for warfare but for the benefit of all mankind during peace. Take radar and all its applications—various plastics—color television with sound—tone modulation (it has received vast increase in perfection since the war, due to communications uses)—refrigeration, to name only a few.

Tomorrow will be a great day.
